Keywords: Abstract: Complex 3D microfluidic structures have been increasingly used in microfluidics, owing to their wide potential applications in lab-on-chip. Characterization of these complex structures has been attracting increasing attention, because complex 3D microfluidic structures usually contain some internal fluid channels or orifices, with diameters ranging from one to several hundred micrometers. However, so far, only few researchers have characterized the flow behavior of these structures, due to the technical difficulty of doing so. In this study, we put forward a detailed quasi-static and dynamic characterization method for complex 3D microfluidic structures with internal fluid channels. The simulation and the experiments are carried out using a syringe pump to drive fluid into a microfluidic chip. Our results show that when the internal channels are shorter than 20 570a42141b
