Using the ovarian cancer cell lines, MDAH-2774 and RMG-1, we have previously shown that carboplatin alone has substantial cytotoxicity. In this report we demonstrate that carboplatin can radiosensitize these cells using a clonogenic assay and an 18-Gy single dose of gamma radiation. Furthermore, this radiosensitization requires neither cell cycle arrest nor repair. In fact, there was a small increase in cell proliferation following treatment with the DNA cross-linking agent carboplatin when used in the absence of radiation. This suggests that the mitogenic effects of carboplatin are small, thus, any effects on radio-sensitization are due to an inhibition of the repair of radiation-induced DNA damage rather than any direct effects of carboplatin on cell growth. We hypothesize that carboplatin radiosensitizes ovarian cancer cells by causing an inhibition of epidermal growth factor receptor (EGFR) signaling. We further hypothesize that EGFR signaling contributes to ovarian cancer cell resistance to ionizing radiation and carboplatin. Using ovarian cancer cells that over-express EGFR (MDAH-2774) and that are resistant to EGFR inhibition (MDAH-2774AR2), we show that EGFR signaling affects cell survival following ionizing radiation and carboplatin. Thus, inhibition of EGFR signaling increases apoptosis induced by carboplatin or radiation in MDAH-2774 cells, and radiosensitizes MDAH-2774 cells and MDAH-2774AR2 cells with carboplatin. We hypothesize that the ability of carboplatin to radiosensitize ovarian cancers via an inhibition of EGFR signaling may be important for the combined modality therapy of ovarian cancer.
