Transmission of SIV/macra virus through breast milk. Breast-feeding may be an important route of vertical transmission of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV). To assess whether the breast milk route of transmission may be used for the spread of simian immunodeficiency virus (SIV), we examined the susceptibility of macaques to infection with different stocks of SIV. In addition, macaques were infected with mammary gland homogenates (MG-H) from different macaques, SIV-seronegative or SIV-seropositive, and lactating macaques were administered SIV-free breast milk (B-H). Oral or intravenous exposure to MG-H or milk products led to infection of macaques with SIV, but not subclinical infection, indicating that macaques are resistant to infection with SIV by breast
