Ultrastructure of putative neural terminals in frontal patches. The influence of LSD (d-lysergic acid diethylamide) on the ultrastructure of frontal patches was investigated. The animals were treated either once or repeatedly with a single dose or ten daily doses of 3.6 mg of LSD/kg of body weight, respectively. The animals were killed by decapitation four hours after the last treatment. Then the whole frontal cortex was taken and divided into frontal patches and parietal cortex. The frontal patches, which are located between the lateral wall of the olfactory bulb and the frontal pole of the cortex, were isolated by a modified technique of Robertson and Ramon (1974). The ultrastructure of the entire frontal patches was studied by means of the freeze-fracture method. The interneurons, which are contained in these patches were investigated by means of intracellular staining in slices, as well as by conventional intracellular injection techniques. The frontal patches contain both inhibitory and excitatory terminals. The interneurons of these patches, which are located on the lateral wall of the olfactory bulb, are mainly GABAergic. Tenth-order harmonic generation in capillaries. An extension of the quantum-electrodynamics (QED) approach by Hanson and Sipe [Phys. Rev. A 52, 1875 (1995)] to tenth-order harmonic generation in capillaries is presented. The fourth- and sixth-order nonlinear susceptibilities are calculated for
