This article summarizes the findings of recent investigations of the natural history of bipolar affective disorder. Prospective follow-up studies and clinic series provide information on the course of disease in patients observed for periods of 1-10 years. These series show a relatively high proportion of patients with a chronic course characterized by long episodes. The review also identifies subgroups of bipolar patients with distinct types of episodic course. The factors thought to influence the prognosis of bipolar illness appear to be both dependent and independent. They b7e8fdf5c8
