www.TorontoStarReprints.com It was an occasion of nostalgia for Toronto's gay community, representing the way it used to be for them, a youthful glittering public party that in the last two decades has become almost exclusively the domain of big events, private social occasions or, if you are lucky, a Saturday or Sunday brunch. For several years, the Luminato Festival of the Arts has done a fine job of drawing the gay community to its annual June event, with its panoply of dance, music, theatre and visual arts. This year the Festival was really the culmination of it all. But Luminato is a good spot for events — they tend to be low-key, more about the experience of arts-going and creativity rather than its self-consciously activist politics. The National was what you might expect from a band that is one of the great rock acts of our time, with a strong song list, a tongue-in-cheek attitude and a powerfully emotional stage show. The music was chunky and soulful, the songs more than ever about life and love, including nods to the politics of the day. What it is, in fact, what it always has been, a rock 'n' roll band, but which has also found more depth. But there were others, too — a lot of young and hungry artists, some of them
