The goal of this grant is to develop a novel treatment for hematopoietic stem cell (HSC) toxicity induced by cancer chemotherapy. Toxicity induced by chemotherapy is a major cause of morbidity and mortality in cancer patients. The proposed project is based on the hypothesis that the transplantation of genetically engineered, potentiative HSCs into lethally irradiated mice will suppress chemotherapy-induced HSC toxicity. This is a novel therapeutic strategy that is completely different from the conventional strategies that use hematopoietic growth factors or cell therapies. The genes to be incorporated into genetically engineered, potentiative HSCs are those that can be triggered by a unique, synthetic, small molecule that enters cells in the presence of DNA. Intracellular transduction of these genes will bring about alterations in HSC biology, which will ameliorate HSC toxicity. This project takes a novel approach in the development of the genetically engineered, potentiative HSCs. The specific aims of this project are to: (1) identify and clone genes that act on HSCs to suppress chemotherapy-induced HSC toxicity in mice, (2) introduce these genes into HSCs and test whether they can ameliorate chemotherapy-induced HSC toxicity, (3) develop a method for tissue-specific, transduction of these genes into HSCs, (4) develop a method for tissue-specific, transduction of these genes into HSCs, and (5) test the potential of these genetically engineered HSCs for a GVHD suppressive effect. The outcome of this project will provide the experimental evidence for the treatment of chemotherapy-induced HSC toxicity in humans./* * Copyright (c) 2015 Goldman Sachs. * All rights reserved. ## What's New in the?

In a mirror, society's anxieties toward race become visible, as such anxieties reflect the lie of liberal societies that aren't racked by radicalisation. Hence, the left, always wanting to be the alternative to a society of extremes, is always doing a faux pas by trying to mask its social-political weaknesses with the façade of an identity-politics movement. In France, where immigration is now the issue of the day, the (Protestant) party established by the Prophet M. Benalla, leader of the "Ecole Nationale d'Administration" and close aide of the President Macron, is trying to play it safe. On May 16, it released its electoral program, recommending the creation of 3 "multicultural spaces", each in different parts of France, mainly where North-African populations live (73% of the North-African population in France currently lives in the North-African population-settlement suburbs of Paris and Marseille: 89% in Paris, 65% in Marseille). This decision is a compromise between the right, which wants to end the presence of minorities in public places (cafés, restaurants, etc.), and the left, which wants to create more bilingual spaces. The left's thinking is a retort to the right's troubling incursion in the electoral debates, what the newspaper Libération wrote: "The right is exasperated that the left, always trying to be the alternative to the extremes of the right, has nowhere to put its position on national identity except to insist on preserving the diversity of France and celebrate the national diversity as the real heart of France". Already in the first page of its program, the party openly proclaims that "France is a multi-cultural society" and "must preserve its multi-cultural identity". This "multi-cultural" strategy, that protects French diversity, has its origins in the thesis of Olivier Todd, the sociologist of the Centre d'etudes politiques de Paris (Cevipof): from "the end of the 19th century", the French defined themselves as a "European people". Nevertheless, this project of "internationalisation" of French society was, according to Todd, precisely what enabled the left to stop "the French nation" from conquering great political, economic, social and cultural spaces, that it currently controls. A left strategy, therefore, had to target the French people, to make it aware of its "national identity". That is why the program called for a "
