Antipsychotic effects of the muscarinic antagonist 4-diphenylacetoxy-N-methylpiperidine in mice. 4-Diphenylacetoxy-N-methylpiperidine (4-DAMP) was evaluated in mice in tests predictive of its antipsychotic activity in man. The effects of drug-induced changes in spontaneous activity, tremors, catalepsy and inhibition of climbing were tested after acute intraperitoneal administration. The drug had little effect in the spontaneous activity test. It dose-dependently decreased the tremor induced by amphetamine. 4-DAMP and haloperidol decreased catalepsy induced by amantadine. The compound did not elicit catalepsy with L-Dopa or with apomorphine. Moreover, 4-DAMP did not alter the effects of apomorphine in mice. The drug was found to inhibit the spontaneous activity of mice in an experimental condition in which spontaneous movement is established in the absence of drug-induced motor activity. 4-DAMP at the highest dose used (0.2 mg/kg) was without effect in a model in which drug-induced motor activity was established. 4-DAMP also blocked the clonic convulsions induced by bicuculline in mice, but had little influence on the apomorphine induced. Pentylentetrazole-induced seizures. The compound had minimal anticonvulsant effect, while this effect was seen after the same dose of haloperidol and atropine. The results indicate that 4-DAMP has antipsychotic properties, particularly related to amantadine-like activity. Imaging microcirculatory derangements following endotoxin administration in newborn piglets using laser Doppler perfusion monitoring. To determine the extent of vascular derangements in the skin following endotoxin infusion in newborn piglets using laser Doppler perfusion monitoring. Piglets (1-2 days old) were anesthetized and artificially ventilated. Thirty micrograms of E. coli endotoxin (LPS) was infused IV over a 30-min period. We developed a laser Doppler perfusion monitoring system utilizing a 670-nm laser and a photodiode array to record microcirculatory perfusion (perfusion units [PU]) by observing temporal and spatial variations in red blood cell flux and by recording optical changes at the skin surface. After 1 h of LPS infusion
