Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to telephone conversation recording and, more particularly, to a method and apparatus for recording telephone conversations in an Internet protocol (IP) network based on unique identifiers assigned to each telephone endpoint device in the network. 2. Description of the Related Art Analog telephone networks convert analog signals from a telephone user into digital signals that can be routed over a network. The digital signals are stored on equipment such as a telephone switching office and are routed to a desired destination. In the event of a telephone network failure, such as a failure of a telephone switching office, some prior art methods allow a lost telephone number to be rerouted by rerouting an incoming call to a stored destination. For example, the network could be restored by rerouting the call to the telephone switching office that originally had the telephone number. Upon detecting the problem with the telephone network, the telephone switching office could transfer the call to an alternate destination. In a switched voice network, the alternate destination can be a telephone switching office in a different location. In the event that the network has not been restored, prior art methods allow the call to be transferred to a telephone customer service number for telephonic assistance. In a radio frequency (RF) network, RF communications channels are used to transmit calls between remote stations. Telephone numbers are a significant part of the infrastructure used to locate and route telephone calls.
