Building an IoT-ready home Aug 25, 2015 · The IoT is disrupting the way we work, communicate, and play. Device makers are releasing new products that enable us to do everything from remote control of a light bulb to read our homes. The Internet of Things are connected to the internet. Our home, our cities, our automobiles. We can remotely control them with our smartphones or tablets. Connected devices will soon be scattered throughout our lives. The Internet of Things connects our homes and cities with the Internet. Our homes, cities and automobiles have been transformed by a growing number of connected devices. The proliferation of consumer IoT devices has been a topic of interest in the industry for years. There are at least 50,000 IoT devices deployed in consumers' homes (Wang et al., 2015). Within a few years, much of the infrastructure will be built. Types of IoT Devices There are many different types of IoT devices and many ways to identify them. They can include smartphones, tablets, smart watches, fitness trackers, thermostats and many more. There are two primary categories: the Internet of things as defined by the IETF, and the Internet of objects defined by the Open Interconnect Consortium (OIC). The Internet of Things is defined as the devices, infrastructure, and services through which any device can be connected to the Internet in order to transfer data, obtain resources, and collaborate. The Internet of things will allow for new devices to be connected to the Internet and interconnect with existing devices and systems using standard protocols. Over time, there will be a steady increase in the number of consumer devices being connected to the Internet of things is the latest buzzword in the IT and telecommunications industry and helps to explain the dramatic changes and infrastructure required to connect home and b
