These packages can be perforated to allow for easy opening of the package, which has the disadvantage that the contents of the package will leak through the perforations. Additionally, the contents can be ejected through the perforations if the rigid packaging is crushed. An alternative to rigid packaging for delivery of a fluid product is a flexible pouch with a tearable seal. The pouch can be opened by twisting or pulling on one end or both ends of the pouch. However, the fluid product is often expelled from the pouch and on to the user's hands upon opening. For this reason, the preferred method of opening a pouch is to tear the pouch along the perforated edges of the pouch before opening the pouch. Perforation along the edges of a pouch to facilitate opening of the pouch results in a discontinuity of the material used to form the pouch. The pouch will be weakened and is therefore susceptible to cracking and breaking. A crack or break in the pouch may cause undesirable fluid product to contact the user's hands. It is desirable that the opening in the pouch be of a size large enough to allow for a user's hand to fully extend into the pouch to minimize the possibility of accidentally spilling the contents of the pouch. social identity as a morally relevant part of our species, that it resides in what Jean-Jacques Rousseau called "the moral man and the political man together." In other words, in our evolutionary past, individuals who saw themselves as "patriotically conscious citizens of their group" were those who survived. Those without such a sense of group identity, and the moral sentiments that go with it, were not free to contribute to the survival of their groups or to the well-being of their children. This framework gives us a new way to think about the problems of drug addiction. We can see that, as with any pathological condition, there are many different kinds of addictive behaviors. But there is a spectrum that runs from one form of addiction (which might be a pathological gambling disorder) to another form of addiction (addiction to drugs) and on to others (addiction to caffeine, or to sugar, or to alcohol, or to an excessive love of late-night shopping, or to lots of things c6a93da74d
