Although non-myeloablative transplantation is a potential therapy for certain hematologic disorders, there is a significant number of diseases for which conventional treatment with high dose chemotherapy/total body irradiation followed by autologous or allogeneic stem cell transplantation is the accepted approach. Increasing the dose of radio- or chemotherapy without increasing the duration of treatment generally does not prolong patient survival. Also, severe and irreversible toxicities and graft-versus-host disease can be major complications of the conditioning regimen. In contrast, myeloablative transplantation is curative for a variety of blood, lymphatic or solid organ malignancies. However, the aplastic phase and acute graft-versus-host disease can be life-threatening and there are significant toxicities resulting from the conditioning regimen. We have initiated a clinical trial using conditioning with cyclophosphamide, total body irradiation and high dose chemotherapy that was similar to the Regimen I/2 of the current proposal. This trial was also associated with significant toxicity and we c6a93da74d
