now, there are some features which most users will never touch the tab player, which can import guitarpro files, and the effects pedal emulations. the a, d and g strings can also be detuned up to a full step. the e string cannot, which means the open e is the lowest note available. again, here is an example of this being a virtual upright bass rather than a double bass or orchestral double basses often play lower notes by using a fifth string, an extension, or detuning, but in contexts where the term upright bass is more common, that open e is normally as low as it gets. detuning the a, d and g strings would be very rare anywhere. still, all these features can sometimes come in handy for some people, so i don't really see any reason not to include them. besides, i can't lie, cranking the distortion pedal and playing some upper-register lines is just plain fun and sound surprisingly good. the virtual strings also work very well, and the tone of the bottom string is surprisingly full and solid, with very good resonance, great sustain and presence. the ping of the g string is rather quick, but not too much to get in the way of the more important strings. if the sample rate is set to 44.1 khz and a high-ish sample rate, it is possible to hear some voices that weren't present when i was testing it. this doesn't really affect the usability much though, and in general, the audio quality is great, and the basics sound just like a real acoustic bass. the plugin is intended to support basses that have many sounds available to the player and actually make them sound as if many people are playing. this is the case with ample bass upright. it can be very percussive or very mellow. ample bass upright iii comes with a preview of up to 8 different slices and is very easy to experiment with. so you dont have to spend a long time trying to get the sound you want. it will turn out exactly the way you want it.
