Although the update is coming in March, Adobe has been kind enough to let me download it now and perform my review. Sometimes there's a valid reason to rush. In this case my exception has more to do with the endeavor. I need Photoshop ... Adobe Photoshop Elements 11 has a new look and a new user experience. But one of the most important things this update has to offer is performance. Finally, the app feels like a real component of the creative workflow, not an afterthought or a laborious process. Even more liberatingly, Adobe Photoshop Elements 11 has fine-grained performance control; it's now possible to easily balance speed, stability, and functionality, all at once. Some 3,500 Final Cut Pro (FCP) users will be able to participate in order to make the application more relevant to the Final Cut Pro X user community, and this is just the start. Additionally, Adobe will be making a number of changes to the FCP X stack. Imagine if you could paint a live picture and have the computer respond to your every touch without slowing the program. Well, it's easier than that, Photoshop now allows you to do that, thanks to a new technology called Touch Retouch. To trigger it, just press a button on your tablet. A long-expected feature actually just flashed onto the Mac version of Photoshop: an Eye Dropper tool, just like the one you get for video or graphic-editing apps. You can place a selection inside any Photoshop object and copy it to the clipboard, or even drop it on a new layer—the same eye-drop capability I used to think I'd never see happen in Photoshop.

The paint tool is a non-selective tool intended for painting. It should be done with the paintbrush tool. While it may seem like the paintbrush is a better tool, it is actually just the opposite. While the paintbrush is a powerful tool for erasing, the paint tool is intended to allow you to build up endless layers. You use the paintbrush to quickly scratch out layers, never erasing them. This is a tool that Adobe calls the Clone Stamp. If you select this tool, and hold down the SHIFT button, it will allow you to transfer pixels from any selected area to any other area on the canvas.
