One of the annoying little things about this release is the absence of a global creative collection. Other than an Unformatted (sidecar) file in exported images, there's no way to apply the newly-added Museum settings to all exported images. What's interesting is how there are more than twice as many settings to keep track of, and how more and more of those settings are applied to more and more files as the number of exported images increases. You can't even set a single image to all formats. Export and workflow are not as separate in Lightroom 5 as they were in the previous release. Export settings are now merged into workflows. This is a combined form of reinventing the wheel. If you manually use the same export settings for every export, it's the same thing as using a workflow for your exports. This is somewhat improved, but only slightly. A workflow is still not the best way to go. Even if you use a custom folder, and keep a 'system configuration' for your workflow, it still works the same way. In the update, Adobe has upgraded the Look & Feel, the previous being 'improved'. I say this because the previous version reeked of using a "look and feel"-esque template, regardless of the company's intent. And, if you are still using Lightroom 4.x, but didn't upgrade in the past six to eight months, you may have seen a similar template. That's because Lightroom 4.x was part of that template. The new Lightroom 5 (as with Photoshop CS6) now auto-vignettes as you zoom in or out. This is done by default. As it happens, I like this feature. However, I did find that using the (now automatic) chromatic aberration control for vignetting produced some interesting results. I've uploaded a few shots taken through walnut and cherry medium windows on my desk to show them off. The images are automatically processed in Lightroom 5 during import. You can't edit photos at all in Lightroom 5 until you've exported them. This is done as a check to make sure all the settings are correct. And, be sure to disable the "Preview available photos after import" option in the import settings. That is a sure way to produce some truly strange results.
