Bishop-Pouget House The Bishop-Pouget House is a historic house located on Prospect Avenue between Bleecker and Henry Streets in Charleston, South Carolina. Design The Bishop-Pouget House is historically significant as one of the most elaborate and expensive houses built in Charleston during the years immediately following the Revolutionary War. It is a fine example of Federalist Colonial Revival architecture. The first construction, in 1807, was a two-story, five bay Federal style brick structure with a two-story, brick end pavilion. It was subsequently expanded to its current Georgian proportions. The roof is a metal gable roof with incised ogee dormers. It is one of only three surviving Federalist houses in the city. History The house was designed for Robert Pouget, a member of the South Carolina Legislature who was a Deputy Commissary General in the Revolutionary War. At the close of the war, Pouget was commissioned Lieutenant Colonel of the 4th Regiment of Infantry. He and his family lived at the house from 1807 until about 1820 when they moved to a home (the former House of Rags) on the corner of Meeting and High Streets. Pouget subsequently lived at the house on Prospect Avenue. Mrs. Pouget died in 1826, and in 1831 her husband was elected to the South Carolina Supreme Court of Judicature where he served for several years. His son Robert Pouget II moved to Charleston with his family in 1831. In 1837 he was elected to the state legislature, and he returned to the house with his family. In 1847, Robert Pouget II's grandson, Robert Pouget III, sold the house to Dr. John Buchanan, who practiced medicine in Charleston. Buchanan sold the house in 1854 to Dr.
