Also critical to the overall quality, if not the viability, of the entire workflow is the updated Blur Gallery. Elements 10 and above originally brought a set of tools for blurring, but they were buried under the default menu of the Blur Gallery, a feature we only rarely used. The Blur Gallery has updated tools and is nicely interactive. I found that using the tool would make the photo slightly sharper rather than blurrier, and the ability to choose the Radius for blurring is a welcome feature. Opacity can be adjusted as well, and next to the slider you can see the current opacity of your image, the number of preview images in the gallery, and your actual filename. Adjusting the right slider in the Blur Gallery will give you several options for how you want the image to blurt out. You can filter your images in the Blur Gallery, according to these options: Natural, Saturated, Sharpened, Round, Iris, Kidney and also Straightout. That last item in that list is the key feature of the Blur Gallery. Adobe has integrated its Photoshop Camera Filter API with the Blur Gallery, letting you create your own filters for use with the Camera app. If you had the patience to browse deep into the official forums, you'd find that you can do a lot more with the new HP Face tool than Adobe expected. The company calls it an "Intelligent Automate feature", letting you turn a box into an eye . Find the part of the image that you want to select, and it'll fill the space with pixels of a selected color. It will allow you to add noise as well, and even indicate whether it is upside down or right side up.
